Teaching Philosophy & Methodology

Visual Communication practice is a dominant component of daily life in today's visual society. The universal interest and use of the Internet is a fundamental example. Today a graphic designer needs to be aesthetically aware, intellectually inquisitive, and technologically proficient. The prepared professional in this competitive atmosphere will need to know numerous approaches to solving conceptually visual problems in our society. Students must be competent in both design and production while upholding a strong emotive responsibility to the environment. The computer has blurred the boundaries between the traditional design roles. This exhilarating time in our profession offers challenges and opportunities to the aspiring student. The one that makes it can be proud of their achievements and successes.

What are his purposes and goals in teaching Graphic Design? Henry's purpose in teaching graphic design is apparent when seeing the work presented in the exhibition. Essentially, it is to gain insight and knowledge through a rigorous sketching process, aesthetic development, and semiotic analysis in the field of graphic design. For the student, this involves long hours and hard work (mentally and physically) at sometimes-tedious tasks. Through these simple exercises, they can perfect their manual skills, develop a clear thought process, and begin the search for excellence solutions.

Henry's intention is to mentally and physically prepare a student to appreciate the fundamentals and principles of design while using today's advanced technology and software to create effective design solutions. He hopes to encourage students to be innovative and understand the backdrop of design history with a focus aimed at sustainability. Although many students within the curriculum are unaware of what to do once they've entered into a graphic design course, his goal is to guide them in the direction where they themselves begin to make quality choices and decisions. As Wolfgang Weingart expresses in his own teachings at Basel School of Design, "Individual Exploration."- is the key to understanding one's path and visual journey. In the end, strong responsibilities, reason, experimentation and history become core essentials in becoming a rich visual communicator.

Henry's cultural perspective on society has sculpted him with valuable knowledge on different cultures and demographics. In return, he hopes to share the tools, experiences and wisdom, from his teachings, as it will help mold the minds of young designers within the education arena. The goal for design students is universal, it is to help them achieve at the highest level.

Research Interest

Merrick Henry's current research and work focuses on experiential methods in the design process—adapting design and creative processes to help with cognitive development through design education. His work specifically focuses on the mapping of ideas, place and space as a formative research and analytic tool. He is the author of several eLearning courses, seminars, workshops, and experimental collaborative design projects that seek to bring various design voices into a dialogue of thinking and making. Henry's involvement with non-profit organizations such as Hope for the Blind (Kano State, Nigeria), Amaranth Foundation (Salina, KS.) and People to People Sports Ambassador Program in Spokane, WA, enables him to bring 'real-world' issues to the educational arena for discussions and critiques.

Henry's love for typography and art direction has helped student based-projects earned high marks and recognition through professional organizations such as AIGA and UCDA (University and College Designers Association) annual design competitions. His professional leadership and guidance as earn him several awards from 'Who's, Who Amongst Executives to other honors such as 'Young Alumnus Award' from Kansas Wesleyan University, Salina, KA.
